TIPS FOR INITIATING BUSINESS CONTACTS

While it helps to have local business associates facilitate business introductions to potential partners, it is widely accepted in Singapore to do “cold calling” and introduce yourself directly. Do note however, that if the other party finds no relevance or interest, he/she would likely give a direct decline or interrupt to cut short the contact. Meetings are short and focused, without overindulgence in courtesies and small talk.

Always address the other party by his/her family name unless he/she asks to be addressed by first name. As in most parts of Asia, the family name is placed first – in front of the first name, in name-cards. However, people with Western names e.g. Peter, George, Anne, etc., would place their family names last – after the Western name.

There is no professional discrimination against women in Singapore. So do not be surprised to meet senior high-ranking female business contacts. A simple handshake would suffice when introduced to female business contacts. Do not attempt to give them a friendly hug or kiss to female business contacts unless you are very familiar with them and know they would not mind.

Be dressed appropriately when meeting local business contacts. For men, it means shirt (jacket is optional). For ladies, it means office attire. Hand out business cards with both hands, with your card details facing them in the right direction. It is acceptable but not standard practice, to provide introductory gifts at the first meeting. Usually, any item from Switzerland or your company would be appreciated.

Most companies in Singapore would have a corporate website. LinkedIn is the professional social media site used by many businesses to update their customers on activities and to network.

BUSINESS PRACTICES

Business discussions are straightforward and no-nonsense. English is widely spoken and most business people are skilled and technically knowledgeable. The sanctity of signed contracts is respected and parties involved are expected to deliver their part as stated in the contracts.

Corruption is virtually non-existent, with stiff penalties imposed on government officials found guilty of accepting bribes. As a WTO member, Singapore's government procurement framework process is open to international tenders. However, local content is required to support the contract.
